Field Study

Field study is an integral part of botany. It enhances the practical knowledge of outdoor setting where scholars learn to observe the plant diversity, their ecological interaction and most importantly the knowledge of local flora. Being a botany student one must be aware of their surrounding flora. Field study helps student to develop plant species identification, data collection, monitoring ecological interaction and adaptations.

Department of Botany offer field classes time to time that enable students to understand the botanical study in their natural habitat. These classes also help students to interact with each other, enhances their communication skills and ability to work as a team.
